HAITI: THE AID DILEMMA

Who Will You Help?

Look deeper at the complexities of providing aid to a country following a major disaster. Using the handout Who Will You Help?, have small student groups play the part of financial officers for a large charity organization who need to determine where and how a major monetary donation should be made. They will need to analyze the services of six different charity organizations, reach group consensus on their priorities, and award the donation. Afterward, have students report their findings to the class and explain their views on whether short-term recovery or long-term commercial improvement/expansion should be the priority. Discuss whether students think increasing foreign aid would be beneficial for Haiti. If so, should Haiti receive emergency aid or long-term sustainable recovery aid? Could it cause Haiti to become dependent on such aid? If so, how could that be avoided?

Imagine you are the financial officer for a large non-profit organization. You have decided to donate $1 million to the earthquake relief effort. Where will you put your money? Below is a list of aid agencies working in Haiti. There are TWO factors to consider in your decision-making:

- The members want to maximize their investment (that is, they DON’T want you just to divide the donations evenly).

- Some of the board’s members are strong advocates of microfinance, giving financial services (including loans) to low-income individuals, who generally do not have access to traditional banks. The goal is to help those in poor conditions create sustainable economic routes out of poverty. Other members of the board consider microfinance to be an ambitious but slow-moving process, one that is less useful in a nation like Haiti that is still struggling to provide basic services to its citizens, like medical supplies and clean water.
What amount will you give each, if any? Justify your answers.
